Excerpt: . . . on the south, which are partly of his construction. The architecture is massive, elaborate, over-decorated, yet, taken all in all, superb. Its heavy magnificence lessens our regret at the loss of the Tuileries which completed the rectangle at the west, for those who remember it say that the smaller palace was overpowered by the imposing New Louvre. Several new churches added to the adornment of the city under the Third Empire. One of these, Trinity, Renaissance in style, is approached by a rampe somewhat recalling that of St. Vincent--de-Paul. Another church, dedicated to St. Augustin, is in the Byzantine style, and is ingeniously though not always acceptably adapted to the limitations of a small triangular space. Among the improvements were the buildings of the present Central Markets on the age-old spot where markets have served Paris; a new building--on the Cit now---for the Tribunal...
